Theft, robbery, assault, vandalism, arson and other crimes against people and property can create serious problems for a business, for employees, and for others.

Some businesses never have crime-related problems, but others have more than their share. In 2016, the FBI reported an estimated 1,515,096 burglaries. Thirty percent of these burglaries were at non-residential locations (stores, offices, etc.). A large quantity of stock and high-value items can tempt people who otherwise would not consider themselves criminals. One of the more disturbing aspects is amateurs, without elaborate equipment or planning, and sometimes on impulse, commit many crimes against property. This erratic pattern, along with the mobility of today's society, has succeeded in making almost any property a target risk. A professional thief with intent to violate your property can be difficult to stop. Your best defense might be to delay access and detect entry points. Loaded cargo awaiting delivery can be locked inside the building or containers within a guarded fenced area. A perpetrator may decide to select a lightly protected target over more secure targets.

Integrity is the essence of everything successful.

Consider the protection available for vulnerable points around a facility. Physical property protection strategies often develop with a consideration for the five Ds of physical security.

Deter — hang signage, giving the impression of security with access designs and lighting

Detect — use natural and passive surveillance, use of active sensors and alarms

Delay — reinforce the perimeter with gated fencing, door locks, and treated window glass

Deny — harden access to targeted items with safes, vaults, or interior caged areas

Defeat — arrest or use of force by police or security guards
